Due Diligence Training for Managers Training Course

Introduction

Introduction

What is Due Diligence Process? Due diligence is a business process undertaken as a preliminary security measure to guard against fraud and misrepresentation prior to a business entering an investment or a contract commitment.

Your due diligence should include bank agreements, loans, collateral pledges, warranties, instalment sales, distribution contracts, stock purchases, mergers, acquisitions or noncompetition agreements.

The Post COVID 19 Business Environment requires that due diligence become more rigorous and stringent because an increased number of businesses and persons may share the tendency to engage in criminal pursuits with a view to resurrecting their respective entities after collapsing due to COVID 19.

When a potential buyer assesses and considers your company, they will want to fully understand your financial, legal, operational, technical and HR affairs.

What areas will this ‘Due Diligence Certificate Training Course’ cover? The key items that a business ought to prioritize in a due diligence check is the loss of key staff, the loss of key supplier relationships, default on payments, legal claims and market slumps.

The detection of any of these warning signs of prior poor business performance must be heeded and taken into cognizance to prevent the business from entering into a risky relationship.

Due Diligence Review (DDR) is a process, through which an individual or an organization, seeks sufficient information about a business entity to reach an informed judgment as to its value for a specific purpose. Offers to purchase a business are generally dependent on the results of a due diligence analysis. This includes reviewing all financial and legal records including anything else deemed material to the sale.

Sellers could also perform a due diligence analysis on the buyer which would help the seller to be aware of the buyer’s ability to purchase and of factors that could affect the purchased entity or the seller once the sale has been completed.

This Xcelerate Training Institute course will empower you with the skills to develop, implement, and maintain a comprehensive due diligence procedure for your organization.
