Coaching Customer Service Skills

Introduction

Introduction

Customer service excellence is being recognized as the holy grail of sales. Competent customer service helps in cultivating a pleasant customer experience. Positive recurring customer experience, in turn, generates customer satisfaction and loyalty towards the brand. It is well known that customer service professionals are the first to interact with prospective customers. Their interaction, attitude, and approach towards customers can make or break a business and its reputation. Thus, it becomes very critical for an organization to have a well-trained customer service staff. It does not suffice to merely have a workforce that is dedicated and hardworking. The customer service team must know how to turn this dedication and knowledge to the organization's advantage. This is where the need for coaching customer service skills arises.

Who is a customer service coach? – A well-experienced and established person of the industry, most certainly. He or she understands various subtleties and nuances of customer service. They are needed to educate beginners in the field of customer service. Such a coach would equip them with the tools of the fundamentals of customer service. The need for coaching also arises for representatives who have been working in customer service for a while but have not been up to date with the latest changes and developments. In such cases, coaching helps them in improving their skills and getting back on track. The need for a dynamic and experienced expert for coaching is actively felt by organizations looking to sharpen their workforce. This coach is often found within the organization itself in the form of team leaders, supervisors, or managers. However, to train others a coach often needs to be assimilated to the needs of the trainees.

Xcelerate Training Institute talent solutions understand that amidst the deluge of constant challenges faced by organizations, customer service skills coaching can often take a backseat. Even if the organization is keen to provide training to its customer service staff, it is faced with a lack of skilled leadership. To combat these issues, Xcelerate Training Institute has introduced this compact and effective ‘Coaching customer service skills training program’. The program has been created for coaches, team leaders, managers, supervisors, or professionals who have been charged with the task of coaching the customer skills within the staff. The course provides an analysis as to how different trainees have different needs and how their specific behavior can be changed. The course will reaffirm the basics of customer service, inculcate the culture of idea sharing, team development, goal setting of the representatives, develop an action plan for future growth, and so on. Correct coaching of leaders and a well-organized coaching program can prove to be the foundation of robust customer service if done rightly.
